perintended by Mr. Lockett, himself a realthy man:

Mr. Lockett employs three hundred and fifmen, including mechanics and other attaches; works two hundred and forty-eight norses and mules, and cultivates thirty-five acres to the hand in cotton and corn. Besides tese principal crops he raises potatoes and vegetables for the entire force. This immense plantation is divided into settlements, on each of which are employed from twenty to sixty tendence of a white man. These laborers are all hired at standing wages, and paid off at the end of every three months.

Mr. Lockett has established a free school, and sent to Oberlin, Ohio, and secured the services of two competent colored teachers. The colored people have also a church, which was crected free of cost- by the philanthropic genrleman. With all these surroundings we infer they must be happy, for Mr. Lockett has the same force he had at the close of the war, not a single one having left his employment. His average crop is three thousand bales.
